Thousands of North Koreans gathered in locations across Pyongyang Monday to dance in celebration of late leader Kim Jong-il.

Men in suits and women in the traditional high-waisted, formless dresses known as hanbok in the South and joeson-ot in the North assembled in formation, squatting patiently until a master of ceremonies gave the command for the party to begin.

Moving smoothly into groups of three concentric circles, they gyrated and kicked in time, clapping in unison to tunes lauding Kim, who died in 2011, including The General Star Beyond the Clouds and We will hold Our General in High Esteem.

Hong Kong's leader has ordered a review of how the government should handle work and travel arrangements after being criticised for underestimating the chaotic start to the week due to widespread damage caused by the most intense typhoon on record.

Chief Executive Carrie Lam Cheng Yuet-ngor insisted on Tuesday it would have been irresponsible for her to declare Monday a day off to recover from the disruption and destruction brought by Typhoon Mangkhut over the weekend, but she asked Secretary for Security John Lee Ka-chiu to conduct a review of the various arrangements for coping with major storms.

She found herself on the defensive after commuters were left confused and angry trying to reach work amid large-scale suspensions of rail and bus services caused by Mangkhut.

You probably never think of coffee, tea, and energy drinks like Red Bull or even Coca-Cola as drugs – but that’s exactly what they are. All of these drinks contain caffeine, a naturally occurring stimulant that, according to Medical News Today, is the world’s most widely consumed drug.

Caffeine affects your body’s central nervous system; it increases your energy levels and improves concentration and focus. Some studies suggest that caffeine can also boost your short and long-term memory, and even make you perform better in sports by improving reaction time and hand-eye coordination. The effects of caffeine usually last three to six hours, depending on how much you take.

Hong Kong is still cleaning up after Typhoon Mangkhut, with students getting Monday and Tuesday off. Meanwhile, the storm left the Philippines devastated – around 40 to 50 people were buried alive by a mudslide with little hope of survival.

Mangkhut struck the Philippines on Saturday and roared into Hong Kong on Sunday, trashing the city’s offices, flooding roads, and flinging trees and debris on to railway tracks. One insurance assessor guessed that there would be more than US$1 billion in claims, making it the most destructive storm in local history.

A row has broken out between China and Sweden over what China says is the bad treatment of mainland tourists in Sweden. A man and his parents had tried to check into Generator Stockholm hostel just after midnight on September 2.

The family had asked if they could remain in the lobby until their room became available. The hostel said there was no place for them to sit down and asked them to leave. The family refused and police were called in to remove them. At one point, the father was carried out of the door by his arms and legs.
